About Campaign

World Board Game Day comes once a year. It is the perfect day to bring people into Board & Brew. The question was simple. How do we turn one day into real footfall. The answer became a campaign called Last Player Standing. It is a board game tournament, built for the day. The prize is not ordinary either. Winners walk away with limited edition board games, hard to find anywhere else. This is not just for serious board game players. It is for anyone who wants a good time, and a shot at something rare.

Nobody remembers who came second. Except their therapist.

This table has seen more betrayal than a soap opera.

For Last Player Standing, we gave the campaign its own visual identity. Some images are plain black and white. Others use a duotone effect, where the black and white carries a pink tinge through it. We also added motion blur in many shots. This mix creates a look that people can recognize right away. The moment someone sees this black, white, and pink identity, they know it is Last Player Standing. The imagery shows people deep in the game, hands moving fast, focus on their faces. The vibe is more intense this time, because it is a tournament. There is still cheering and joy at the end, but the energy leading up to it feels sharper, more cut-throat. This carries through everywhere, including the billboards. Every piece of material also carries a catchy line. These lines are made to spark curiosity, and pull people in before they even know what the campaign is about.
